Need another pair of hands? Community service workers may be the answer.

Queensland Corrective Services supervises persons throughout Queensland who are ordered by courts to perform unpaid community service.

Every day throughout Queensland community service workers are involved in worthwhile local community service projects. Over the years they have helped to maintain and improve sporting venues, cemeteries and parks, sorted recyclable items for resale by charities and assisted in food preparation and laundry services for residential care establishments.

Current community service projects include aged persons' homes, historical societies, service clubs, sporting associations, welfare agencies and animal refuges.

Your organisation can apply to be an approved community service project if you meet the following criteria. Your organisation must:

- be a "not for profit" organisation;
- be able to provide adequate supervision by a responsible adult;
- be able to meet workplace health and safety requirements; and
- have public liability insurance.

What is community service?

Community service is unpaid work that an offender is ordered to do by a court. Offenders can be sentenced to a community service or an intensive correction order. People can also apply to do community service instead of paying a fine.

The purpose of community service is to provide reparation to the community. Over the years many worthwhile community projects have been undertaken at a minimal cost to the community.

Community service can also help offenders turn their lives around. Worthwhile social contacts can be formed, jobs found, work habits re-established for the unemployed and positive attitudes developed through helping others.

How are the orders made?

The courts may order offenders aged 17 years or over to perform community service if they are sure that:

- the offender is a suitable person to perform community service;
- community service is available in the area where the offender lives; and
- the offender agrees to obey the conditions of the order.

Community service work should not conflict with the worker's religious beliefs or interfere, as far as practicable, with family, educational or employment obligations.

Responsibilities of the Queensland Corrective Services

Queensland Corrective Services will:

- assess offenders' suitability for allocation to a work project. Please note that privacy restrictions prevent the release of details of offences of community service workers. Community service projects can request they are not allocated offenders who have committed certain types of offences;
- ensure that workers obtain a "blue card" clearance where required under legislation for the protection of children and young people;
- ensure workers understand the rules of community service and their obligations regarding their court order before they are assigned to a project;

- liaise with community service projects regarding any issues related to community work or behaviour and remove a community service worker if requested by the project;
- take disciplinary action against offenders who fail to comply with the terms of their order; and
- maintain central administrative records.

Responsibilities of the community service project

The community service project undertakes to:

- provide a project supervisor;
- provide day-to-day supervision of community service workers at the work site;
- provide adequate and appropriate instruction and training to the community service workers, particularly in relation to the use of any necessary tools or equipment;
- provide sunscreen, drinking water, tools or equipment and any protective gear required;
- ensure workplace health and safety requirements are met;
- ensure security of the premises;
- maintain accurate daily attendance records for each worker;
- notify Queensland Corrective Services of any difficulties, or if children may be present at a worksite.

Responsibilities of the community service worker

Community service workers must:

- report to their work site as directed;
- satisfactorily perform community service; and
- obey all reasonable directions.

Workers will usually be expected to make their own way to the community service project and bring their own meals for the day.

What happens to community service workers who don't obey the rules?

Offenders who fail to comply with their orders are removed from the community service project and returned to court for breach action. Depending on the order, the court may impose a fine, make an order for them to continue with the community service, or re-sentence them for the original offence. A fine option order will revert to the original fine, payable immediately, with allowance made for the time worked.

Injuries and Workers' Compensation

Community service workers are covered for statutory benefits under the Agency's policy of insurance with WorkCover Queensland (section 20 of the Workers Compensation and Rehabilitation Act 2003). Community service projects, workers and Queensland Corrective Services all have a responsibility to ensure that community service work is carried out safely in a safe environment.

If you would like to apply to be an approved community service project, please contact your nearest Probation and Parole District Office for an application form.
